INTRODUCTION.

A Pocket Dictionary and Peking Syllabary is so evident a want that little need be written to recommend the thought of this small volume. A few words of explanation are required. The book contains, including duplicates, 10,587 characters. These characters are arranged in alphabetical order, the tone of each being indicated by a figure (or figures) at the upper right hand corner of the character. These figures mark the tones as follows : 1. 上平, 2. 下平, 3. 上聲, 4. 去聲. Occasionally a character is read in two or more tones, with the same meaning. These varying tones are indicated by the use of two or more figures instead of one, usually written in their natural order. If, however, any tone is considered the preferable reading, it is written first ; as, e. g. 昂<sup>21</sup>, the second tone is printed first as the better reading. Frequently the tone last written, especially in the case of 入聲 characters, is that given by teachers as a more classical reading. A very common reading in the North for 入聲 characters is one of the even tones, 上平 or 下平.

In each double column of characters, the second column is composed of radicals. Each character is thus immediately followed by its radical. Sometimes 俗 occurs in place of the radical. This marks the character as a vulgar and unauthorised form. Frequently 減 will be found, showing that the character thus written is an abbreviated form, often found in manuscript.

The figures in the third column refer to the page in Williams' Syllabic Dictionary where each character may be found. These figures are sometimes followed by a comma or semicolon. The comma indicates that the character is a colloquial character, or has colloquial uses. This rule does not apply to names of persons and places, which do not appear to need such designation. The semicolon indicates that the character is used in a higher style of speech nearly akin to the classical. When no diacritic mark follows the page number, the character may be considered classical. If a circle occurs in place of the number, the character will not be found in Williams' Dictionary. To this remark there are one or two exceptions, where it is used in Williams in a different sense.

There is a very brief definition of each character, in which the following abbreviations continually occur, S for surname, and C for classifier. The surnames thus referred to are only those found in the Chinese book of surnames, (百家姓).

If a character has other readings, the definition is followed by a semicolon, after which the various readings are given, the numbers 1. 2. 3. 4. referring to other tones under the same sound. The character may be found under each of these various readings, with the definition for that reading. When, however, the words "also read", enclosed in brackets, occur, the character will not be found elsewhere.

Sometimes after the number of page, the character 文 or 俗 occurs. The first marks the reading as more classical, the second as a lower colloquial reading.

The character 張 is read in the first tone, has 弓 for its radical, may be found on page 22 of Williams, is a colloquial character, and, besides its ordinary meaning, is used as a classifier or numerative (of tables, etc.), and also as a surname.

Page 28, under Chieh. 節<sup>24</sup> 竹 974, Joint, verse, festival; 3. The numbers at the upper corner (節<sup>24</sup>) indicate, 2 the common reading, and 4 a reading frequently given by teachers.

It may be added to the above that Sir Thomas Wade's system of spelling has been followed as the more commonly accepted and widely used. A few sounds found in Wade's Syllabary are however omitted, as chio, ch'io, chüo, ch'üo, chuo, ch'uo, hsio, hsüo, lüo, nio, nüo, yo. These may be considered as rather affected pronunciations used by some teachers, which it is quite as well not to imitate. Instead of ho, ko, and k'ó, hê, kê and k'ê are given as more accurately representing the Pekingese sound.

The definitions are necessarily brief, and the words a, an, to, commonly used to distinguish between noun and verb, are usually omitted. If the defining word is used both as a noun and a verb, the omission of the article marks it as a noun. Whether the first definition be a noun or a verb, the definitions following are the same, unless the words plainly indicate the contrary. A change from noun to verb, or the contrary, is indicated, when necessary, by the ordinary particles.

Much pains has been bestowed on the various particulars mentioned above, and it is hoped the volume will be found generally correct, and useful as a pocket or table companion.
